Her tireless assistant, Kim, is there every step of the way—creating recipes, sourcing ingredients, and spending hot Texas days in what amounts to a large metal box—until a wrong step sends her to the hospital with a broken leg. Oatmeal is boring. It needs zip. It needs zing. What if Bean's donuts could help Frank's oatmeal? What if donuts and oatmeal could work together, just like friends? Dry wit meets stylish, comical artwork as introspective Frank and gregarious Bean return in a tale for anyone who likes food, unlikely friendships, and laugh-out-loud funny adventures.

Lucas loves his job. Too bad he's not allowed to take a bite out of the boss. Considering all the crap Lucas Barnes has done to achieve self-employed independence, taking a job making fish tacos for a local food truck should be a no-brainer. In the off hours, he can even work on his dream business: health-conscious energy bars. But it turns out the hardest part isn't the long hours, the stifling heat inside the truck during a Los Angeles summer, or even the non-vegan menu, it's his new boss. Tony Blake is over-confident and an enthusiastic carnivore--and also one of the hottest, funniest, most charming guys Lucas has ever met. Even when Tony is driving him crazy, he's completely irresistible. Lucas knows hooking up with the boss is off-limits, but Tony is a tough guy to resist. And with the two of them spending the steamy summer evenings tucked in each other's pockets . . . it turns out it's not a question of if, but a question of when.
